Former CIA agent set to speak at Monmouth

MONMOUTH — Peter N. James, a physicist, rocket engineer, author, adventurer and former CIA agent who is touring the United States recruiting volunteers for what he calls "Operation Red Dog," will speak at Monmouth College at 8 p.m. Tuesday.

The operation is named for the once secret project initiated in 1971, when James was fired by Pratt & Whitney Aircraft for revealing his intentions to expose corruption in the military-industrial complex.

A 1962 graduate of Case-Western Reserve University and author of "The Air Force Mafia," James avows that his "Operation Red Dog" has attracted former American espionage agents, muckrakers, students, professors and concerned citizens. He now is forming local branches so his organization can "expose corruption on the state and local levels" as well.

The former rocket engineer and foreign technology expert for Pratt & Whitney became heavily involved with the CIA and Air Force intelligence as he travelled extensively in Europe and South America, where he met frequently with foreign scientists and espionage agents.

He has since cooperated with several congressional investigations and the Rockefeller Commission in an attempt to expose and make public questionable activities of the U.S. government.

Those who enlist in his private agency will be asked to devote several hours each week to special projects which will be coordinated by specialists, including foreign intelligence agents, on his staff.
